The more you test, the less bugs you'll have. I've heard that some companies are using a "feature activation periods". For example: Feature A is released on day 1. There is testing phase where all bugs for that feature are collected. After testing is done, Feature A is activated on day 20. From day 20 till Feature B is activated Feature A is constantly live. Does this mean that bug accumulation is significantly lower for this feature? As an example: One bug is found and reported after Feature A is activated. After one month, another bug is found and reported. A: Maintaining a constant feature state can create problems that are not present for a feature released to production on day 1. My guess would be that bugs are found earlier for a feature that is turned on throughout the entire life of the feature. The reason is that, at least in a debug build, the feature is turned on when a developer wants to find problems. With a feature that is active throughout the entire life of the feature, it is also turned on when the
