Duxbury Braille Translator 11.1 Free Cracked this week, we wrap up our look at the new braille translator, 11.1. in our wrap up story, we cover some of the changes coming in the 11.1 release, as well as some of the new features and how they will impact those who use the duxbury translator. a few months ago, deepbraille announced that they were going to share the code behind their braille code writer application so that blind and visually impaired people everywhere could have the ability to create and edit their own braille documents. in this week's blind bargains, we can reveal that deepbraille has done just that. we had the pleasure of discussing their plan with their founder, michael kowalczyk, and he's been working on the idea since 2008, when he first created the original application. after being away from blind school for a number of years, michael kowalczyk got the itch to go back to school and by the end of 2014 had completed his m.a. in international education and literacy. with his new studies behind him, he's now decided to take advantage of this new found freedom and go back to the one subject that was a part of his school days: braille. he's created a new application called brillatronic, a mobile application that allows blind and visually impaired people to write, edit, print, store and share their braille documents. in this interview, michael shares some insights into the development of his new application and the vision behind it. at the end of the year, blind buyers are looking for an affordable notetaker with a lot of bang for their buck. and as far as bang goes, the new braillenote touch pro packs a lot of features and functions into a reasonable priced package. braille sense is a product that's been available for a while now, and it's a solid product, but one that's been missing a number of key functions, including pinyin, voiceover and recently integrated dynamic menus. with the release of the braillenote touch pro, the company has stepped up to deliver the long-awaited functionality. in this interview, greg stilson of humanware joins us to dive deeper into the product and also offers some insights on the upcoming release of the braillenote touch pro 3.0. greg discusses the new architecture of the product, dynamic menus, and speaks about the new braillesense connector that will allow you to connect an external microphone to the touchpro. we also learn about the new achievements available on the device, including the ability to set up to 10 languages.
