Image editing is all about layers, really. The Photoshop team has been doing great work on this front for years, and every major version does improve on one or more aspects of this core approach. Photoshop CC 2018 brings some exciting new ways to work with products in your layers—specifically, Photoshop Sketch and Photoshop Content-Aware Fill. And that's not the end of the list of new features for a new version; it's just the beginning. There's lots of talk about AI-based editing tools. Drawing in Photoshop and Sketch has been AI-driven for a while now, and Content-Aware Fill supercharges that process in an entirely different way. The team at Adobe showed off this feature at last year's Photoshop World. I love how they describe it: "Content-Aware was the native way to fill without getting a perfect result all the time. It was the starting point for this latest development, which uses AI to analyze the image and fill the background as soon as you click OK or apply. This results in an image that is more focused and beautiful at a glance." Sketch and Content-Aware Fill are a game-changer. The basic workflow consists of overlaying an image over a photo and sending it off to Photoshop. Photoshop will blend the layers together using various settings, before Adobe will let you tweak a couple layers, like the background. Adobe Photoshop (formerly Adobe Photoshop Elements) provides the following:

- Painting and vector editing
- Correction of red eye, lens distortion, and other mis-focused images
- And hundreds of other editing tools
