For the first time I open Adobe Photoshop and see the watermark of my logo on the preview window/screen. Sometimes it is invisible so only when looking at the preview window can I see it. I have had an image open for a couple of hours and still cannot locate it. I find I like the watermark and don't mind that it is brand new.

My only complaint is, I don't even know how it got there. :-) sheth The new client can handle 5000 composites in Blob Layers. Bear in mind I have no big project of this size so this is just a little bit larger than I do usually. I do stick to relative sizing though. For instance, my 11, 35, 85, and 150 lense fronts all need to be 5700 pixels wide. They are all in the same size relative to the original. You can't have different sized layers for different times or distances or what have you. This is not a real big deal to me. I can use my lense front of a 200mm lens from way back (good for small birds) and a 200mm lense front from circa 2013 (good for landscapes). Both will have the same 5700 pixels that I use for the tones. The only difference I can see is that the newton bezier has more points and it will have more layers. So the maximum size of all my lense fronts this way is 12800 pixels on the one layer. This still gives me plenty of flexibility and allows me to load about 5,000 images to one template. While using Photoshop I was looking for some challenge. I wanted it to implement something that looked somewhat like a "spot light" that could be moved around using a dial. I already have a light that works with radio-control. This wasn't really what I had in mind. The light is shaped like a water filter and must be placed manually inside the lens. So when I have a template that is already set up I usually dont bother using the water filter.

Thanks,.....

This was one thing I didn't like about Photoshop. Another was the Placement tool.
