Along with the full Windows/Mac version, today's Photoshop CC update also brings support for Cambridge Analytics' annotation app, Cambridge 360 . This feature allows you to annotate any image with a 360° viewing mechanism, which preserves the relative placement of annotations in a clickable set of lenses. These lenses can offer quick access to the most relevant annotations, and also allow you to create new annotations and change attributes such as color, size and transparency, just as you would with a drawing tool. On top of that, Unity Lens allows you to easily search the Web for potentially relevant annotation data. The excellent new pro level app is also integrated with Adobe Sensei technology, using this to classify the image into new types. For example, you can now use Versioning to allow you to tag and name versions. This isn't as complicated as it sounds, as the app creates the annotated versions, and you just choose your preferred output format for the images. The Merge panel becomes handy in case you want to use any of the other features of the app as separate files. Check it out in the Adobe Help & Support Website .

As the preview process has evolved over the years, the preview options in Photoshop have become quite refined. Older users may have a taste for the old-school process where they can easily cut an image and it will always remain the same size. However, for more recently released software, such as the new CC release, this is no longer so easy. Compression and OCR with True Depth Recording take up space, and on some devices, the preview window is quite small. This, along with other similar small factors all react to the type of output device you are going to use. For most, this is not a problem, but for those who rely on the dedicated reviewing tools, it certainly is. Perhaps an option to save the 'full screen' preview for the desired output device and then you can always 'match' it by creating a new "full-size" email or file, for example. This is possible from the Options menu, but for most users, it will be no use
